Bruised Fruit

Piles, preparation, overgrowth: the pictures that make up Compile present domestic and urban moments that convey the pace of living things. Artist Heather Rasmussen has been making these photographs for several years, documenting an annual Christmas goose, a trip to Puerto Rico, and quiet afternoons at home around Los Angeles. She makes photographs of family, vacations, and food much like many of us do.

Compile was not initially conceived as an art project but instead grew from a private archive of moments. Gathered together in retrospect, Rasmussen’s keen composition and color quietly reaffirm the value of photographing the everyday, resuscitating a genre that in the moment of Instagram may otherwise seem stale as an artistic approach. She captures the world through which she moves, finding surreal accidents and using the camera to show us something about this delicate life.

Rasmussen is best known for DestructConstruct (2008-13), a photographic series that investigates the global system of commerce. Based on images of shipping container disasters, she constructs and arranges modular paper sculptures in her studio to carefully reproduce the original photographs. Compile, by contrast, brings together pictures taken in a much more happenstance and unsystematic way, outside the studio: she shows us the striated patterns of a rock face, a heaping plate of empty clam shells after a family meal.

If one body of work seems premeditated and the other improvised, both share the artist’s careful observation of how things fit together in the world. A longtime ballet dancer, Rasmussen is attuned to gravity and pose, as well as to the strength and tension that must be exerted to hold things in place. Her photographs picture moments passed during travel, or the usually unremarked minutes just before or after an event. The richness she encounters is met with decay, and luxury viewed with an understanding of the precarious balance of a good life.
